The reasonable doubt which will justify and require an acquittal of an accused must not be as to any particular fact in the case, but when the evidence as a whole is considered,⁹⁸ and an instruction which does not require the reasonable doubt which will justify acquittal to arise from a consideration of all of the evidence in the case, or words of similar import, is not in the best form. An instruction requiring an acquittal upon a reasonable doubt resting upon a part of the evidence, considered separately from the whole evidence, is properly refused.¹ According to the weight of authority, it will be sufficient to charge that the jury should
