

Ten Ways to Commit Professional Malpractice (And Avoid it!)

About the eBook This Chapter was originally presented in seminar format for lawyers from the authors perspective in defending legal malpractice claims for 18 years. However, in defending other professionals such as accountants, architects, engineers and financial professionals, many of the same concepts and pitfalls apply to those practices. This Chapter expands the legal malpractice/ethical considerations to a broader professional liability perspective. The author regularly consults with professionals on ethical liability issues on behalf of professionals as they arise. Having devoted a career to litigating the business disputes, unfair competition, fiduciary duty and general complex litigation matters on behalf of businesses and individuals as well as legal, accountancy, financial and engineering professionals themselves when they face exposure, the authors analytical view is from the trenches, not an idealistic academic standard. We approach this from the perspective of the exacting standards owed by professionals to their clients and urge caution, with recognition of the need to also be judicious with their use of time, cost effectiveness and defensive practice while achieving results for their clients and profitability for their own businesses. Quite literally, in litigated matters, we perform an autopsy on the prior representation to evaluate key defense strategies, and avoid exposure without undue reliance on the battle of experts between the plaintiff and defense experts on standard of care.[1] Many of the points herein are learned from those lessons. Certainly volumes have been written on behalf of each discipline of professionals; this is an effort to highlight the key aspects of the professional-client relationship and related issues with practical considerations.
