

24 Ways to Reduce Job Stress and Pressure (Stress Management Book 1)

Wherever you go today, you hear the same lament from business executives-- the pace of business has become immediate. It moves at the speed of voice and email. People are using all kinds of tools and technology, and still the paper mushrooms. Instead of one phone number now, people have got six--one for their office, fax machine, car, home, administrative assistant, and voice mail, perhaps one for a beeper and who knows what else. Since information is a form of power, you can use it for strategic advantage. The mere fact that the information highway exists, however, means that information is disseminated at greater speeds and volumes than ever before. Currently, increased flow of information and increased technological intrusion in society all but ensures that you'll face an ever-increasing array of work-related expectations. You can count on higher expectations, especially when you have the same finite resources, leading to more stress.
