From the Author: Five Tips for Photographing Children 1. Try to find a very simple and uncluttered background so that the children stand out. If your eyes dont go to their faces and skin, youll know your composition/background needs cleaning up (and NOT with Photoshop, but with more observing eyes before you click the shutter!). 2. Avoid using the flash and try to learn to see light quality and direction. That way youll avoid the deer in the headlights look and will be able to see the roundness and softness of skin and features. If you must use a flash, learn how to cut the intensity WAY down so that it is more of a fill-flash. 3. Keep an eye out for natural poses that you see your child in every day so that you begin to appreciate them and feel less need to POSE them. Sometimes that means catching them spontaneously when they arent aware that you are there with a camera. 4. Learn to appreciate expressions that arent necessarily big smiles. If you convey that you are not looking for smiles, they might be less likely to feel obliged! Psychologically, as parents, we want our children to look happy, but all expressions are precious to capture and behold. That way you will have an day-to-day story of your children in all manner of moods, expressions and behaviors! You will really appreciate that as you look back over a childs life. 5. All photography, including photography of children, is about learning to see light and composition better to improve the impact of the photograph. Once you have done that, photographs of your children will dazzle! By all means, have fun learning and improving because that, too, will show in your images.
