The type of collectible we are looking at today are tiny balls, usually made of glass or clay and they have been a popular pastime for children for hundreds of years.

Called marbles, these usually small items can sell for several hundred pounds or dollars or other country currency because, as you will shortly discover, this particular collectible sells worldwide, on and outside of eBay, but its eBay well talk about today.

I freely admit to making good profits selling this particular collectible on eBay and Ive heard a great many other people telling similar tales. Ive already passed on my experience of more than ten years selling this and similar items on eBay in my role as editor of London-based print newsletter eBay Confidential. And now I want that very same knowledge and experience to help you spot a specific collectible lurking anonymously alongside mainly low value items and for you to turn your finds into high profits on eBay. Today I am going to tell you about small items that can sometimes be found lurking unceremoniously alongside other small collectibles on eBay but still end up making several thousand pounds (or dollars, or other worldwide currency) for their sellers on eBay. These usually small items with massive collector and buyer potential and sometimes fetching record high prices on eBay are marbles. The game of marbles was especially popular in the early 1900s when many of the worlds leading manufacturers were creating one million or more marbles daily, featuring mainly colourful spirals and other designs placed inside a sturdy ball of which countless examples remain in existence today. Marbles are usually small glass balls that normally get rolled on the ground or other flat surface. When I played marbles the aim was to knock other players marbles off target and beat them to a predetermined location, usually the very centre of a large circle. Every time you hit another players marble you got to keep it.

As you'll soon learn, some marbles are anything but small and not all are made from glass. And some are so rare you'd never dream of playing with them. Its variations like size and material, along with age and maker and some other specific characteristics that can make a marble worth thousands of pounds. Your job is knowing what those characteristics are and how to spot them! People today play with marbles much less than in the early to middle 1900s and much further back in time and these tiny works of art are now viewed mainly as collectors pieces with potential to make fabulous high prices on eBay.
