The following work begins with simple objects, as best adapted to beginners; and it is required that each should be copied with exactness, before they advance with the after Progressive Lessons. It is an alphabet followed by words, and from words to sentences, it being precisely the same in its elements with language. In copying, the proportion should be first lightly sketched in a general way; and before the finished copy is attempted, it is enforced as of the greatest importance, that it should be strictly compared with the original, because the foundation of drawing is truth or accuracy. Rambling, careless touches must be avoided, as beginners are often encouraged in what is called a freedom of handling, which is too often a want of restraint, and will degenerate into a slovenly habit. Freedom must be the confidence of knowledge, it being far better at the beginning to draw with stiffness, than inaccuracy. After having successfully copied the first examples, the student may congratulate himself on his advancement beyond the great difficulties, and as he proceeds, his pleasures will encourage him with resolution to persevere.
